Jonathan Pershing

Jonathan Pershing is Director of the Climate, Energy and Pollution Program at the World Resources Institute, an environmental think tank based in Washington, D.C. He works on domestic and international climate and energy policy, including emissions trading, energy technology, and the evolving architecture of international climate agreements. Pershing is actively involved in projects with individual states and the US federal government on climate change and energy policy, as well as governments in the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, the Group of Eight, and major developing nations. He serves both on the Resources Panel of the Northeast States Regional Greenhouse Gas Initiative and as the facilitator of the RGGI negotiations, on the Advisory Board of the Oregon Climate Trust, and on the Chicago Climate Exchange. Pershing served for five years as the Head of the Energy and Environment Division at the International Energy Agency in Paris, responsible for emissions trading research and other energy related policy.

Jonathan served as lead U.S. negotiator for the 1992 United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change and its 1997 Kyoto Protocol. He has a PhD in Geology and Geophysics from the University of Minnesota.
